NICCĀ vata sañkhārā—“Impermanent, alas, are all formations!”—is the phrase used in Theravāda Buddhist lands to announce the death of a loved one, but I have not quoted this line here in order to begin an obituary. I do so simply to introduce the subject of this essay, which is the word sañkhārā itself. Sometimes a single Pāli word has such rich implications that merely to sit down and draw them out can shed as much light on the Buddha’s teaching as a long expository article. This is indeed the case with the word sañkhārā. The word stands squarely at the heart of the Dhamma, and to trace its various strands of meaning is to get a glimpse into the Buddha’s own vision of reality.

The word sañkhārā is derived from the prefix sam, meaning “together,” joined to the noun kāra, “doing, making.” Sañkhāras are thus “co-doings,” things that act in concert with other things, or things that are made by a combination of other things. Translators have rendered the word in many different ways: formations, confections, activities, processes, forces, compounds, compositions, fabrications, determinations, synergies, constructions. All are clumsy attempts to capture the meaning of a philosophical concept for which we have no exact parallel, and thus all English renderings are bound to be imprecise. I myself use “formations” and “volitional formations,” aware this choice is as defective as any other.

However, though it is impossible to discover an exact English equivalent for sañkhārā, by exploring its actual usage we can still gain insight into how the word functions in the “thought world” of the Dhamma. In the suttas the word occurs in three major doctrinal contexts. One is in the twelvefold formula of dependent origination (paticca-samuppāda), where the sañkhāras are the second link in the series. They are said to be conditioned by ignorance and to function as a condition for consciousness. Putting together statements from various suttas, we can see that the sāṅkhāras are the kammicly active volitions responsible for generating rebirth and thus for sustaining the onward movement of samsāra, the round of birth and death. In this context sāṅkhāra is virtually synonymous with kamma, a word to which it is etymologically akin.

The suttas distinguish the sāṅkhāras active in dependent origination into three types: bodily, verbal, and mental. Again, the sāṅkhāras are divided into the meritorious, demeritorious, and “imperturbable,” i.e., the volitions present in the four formless meditations. When ignorance and craving underlie our stream of consciousness, our volitional actions of body, speech, and mind become forces with the capacity to produce results, and of the results they produce the most significant is the renewal of the stream of consciousness following death. It is the sāṅkhāras, propped up by ignorance and fueled by craving, that drive the stream of consciousness onward to a new mode of rebirth, and exactly where consciousness becomes established is determined by the kammic character of the sāṅkhāras. If one engages in meritorious deeds, the sāṅkhāras or volitional formations will propel consciousness toward a happy sphere of rebirth. If one engages in demeritorious deeds, the sāṅkhāras will propel consciousness toward a miserable rebirth. And if one masters the formless meditations, these “imperturbable” sāṅkhāras will propel consciousness toward rebirth in the formless realms.

A second major domain where the word sāṅkhāras applies is among the five aggregates. The fourth aggregate is the sāṅkhāra-khandha, the aggregate of volitional formations. The texts define the sāṅkhāra-khandha as the six classes of volition (cha cetanākāyā: volition regarding forms, sounds, smells, tastes, tactile objects, and ideas. Though these sāṅkhāras correspond closely to those in the formula of dependent origination, the two are not in all respects the same, for the sāṅkhāra-khandha has a wider range. The aggregate of volitional formations comprises all kinds of volition. It includes not merely those that are kamically potent, but also those that are kammic results and those that are kamically inoperative. In the later Pāli literature the sāṅkhāra-khandha becomes an umbrella category for all the factors of mind except feeling and perception, which are assigned to aggregates of their own. Thus the sāṅkhāra-khandha comes to include such ethically variable factors as contact, attention, thought, and energy; such wholesome factors as generosity, kindness, and wisdom; and such unwholesome factors as greed, hatred, and delusion. Since all these factors arise in conjunction with volition and participate in volitional activity, the early Buddhist teachers decided that the most fitting place to assign them is the aggregate of volitional formations.

The third major domain in which the word sāṅkhāra occurs is as a designation for all conditioned things. In this context the word has a passive derivation, denoting whatever is formed by a combination of conditions; whatever is conditioned, constructed, or compounded. In this sense it might be rendered simply “formations,” without the qualifying adjective. As bare formations, sankhāras include all five aggregates, not just the fourth. The term also includes external objects and situations such as mountains, fields, and forests; towns and cities; food and drink; jewelry, cars, and computers.

The fact that sankhāras can include both active forces and the things produced by them is highly significant and secures for the term its role as the cornerstone of the Buddha’s philosophical vision. For what the Buddha emphasizes is that the sankhāras in the two active senses—the volitional formations operative in dependent origination, and the kammic volitions in the fourth aggregate—construct the sankhāras in the passive sense: “They construct the conditioned; therefore they are called volitional formations. And what are the conditioned things they construct? They construct the body, feeling, perception, volitional formations, and consciousness; therefore they are called volitional formations” (SN XXII.79).

Though external inanimate things may arise from purely physical causes, the sankhāras that make up our personal being—the five aggregates—are all products of the kammically active sankhāras that we engaged in our previous lives. In the present life as well the five aggregates are constantly being maintained, refurbished, and extended by the volitional activity we engage in now, which again becomes a condition for future existence. Thus, the Buddha teaches, it was our own kammically formative sankhāras that built up our present edifice of personal being, and it is our present formative sankhāras that are now building up the edifices of personal being we will inhabit in our future lives. These edifices consist of nothing other than sankhāras as conditioned things, the conditioned formations comprised in the five aggregates.

The most important fact to understand about sankhāras, as conditioned formations, is that they are all impermanent: “Impermanent, alas, are formations.” They are impermanent not only in the sense that in their gross manifestations they will eventually come to an end, but even more pointedly because at the subtle, subliminal level they are constantly undergoing rise and fall, forever coming into being and then, in a split second, breaking up and perishing: “Their very nature is to arise and vanish.” For this reason the Buddha declares that all sankhāras are suffering (sabbe sankhārā dukkha)—suffering, however, not because they are all actually painful and stressful, but because they are stamped with the mark of transience. “Having arisen they then cease,” and because they all cease they cannot provide stable happiness and security.

To win complete release from suffering—not only from experiencing suffering, but from the unsatisfactoriness intrinsic to all conditioned existence—we must gain release from sankhāras. And what lies beyond the sankhāras is that which is not constructed, not put together, not compounded. This is Nibbāna, accordingly called the Unconditioned—asaṅkhata—the opposite of what is sankhata, a word which is the passive participle corresponding to Nibbāna is called the Unconditioned precisely because it’s a state that is neither itself a saṅkhārā nor constructed by saṅkhāras; a state described as visaṅkhāra, “devoid of formations,” and as sabbasaṅkhāra-samatha, “the stilling of all formations.”

Thus, when we put the word saṅkhāra under our microscope, we see compressed within it the entire worldview of the Dhamma. The active saṅkhāras consisting in kammically active volitions perpetually create the saṅkhāra of the five aggregates that constitute our being. As long as we continue to identify with the five aggregates (the work of ignorance) and to seek enjoyment in them (the work of craving), we go on spewing out the volitional formations that build up future combinations of aggregates. Just that is the nature of samsāra: an unbroken procession of empty but efficient saṅkhāras producing still other saṅkhāras, riding up in fresh waves with each new birth, swelling to a crest, and then crashing down into old age, illness, and death. Yet on it goes, shrouded in the delusion that we’re really in control, sustained by an ever-tantalizing, ever receding hope of final satisfaction.

When, however, we take up the practice of the Dhamma, we apply a brake to this relentless generation of saṅkhāras. We learn to see the true nature of the saṅkhāras, of our own five aggregates: as unstable, conditioned processes rolling on with no one in charge. Thereby we switch off the engine driven by ignorance and craving, and the process of kammic construction, the production of active saṅkhāras, is effectively deconstructed. By putting an end to the constructing of conditioned reality, we open the door to what is ever-present but not constructed, not conditioned: the asaṅkhata-dhātu, the unconditioned element. This is Nibbāna, the Deathless, the stilling of volitional activities, the final liberation from all conditioned formations and thus from impermanence and death. Therefore our verse concludes: “The subsiding of formations is blissful!”
